Rice Will Join NSA; Calvin’s Policy Vague

By LARRY MOORE

The major portion of the Senate meeting Wednesday night was consumed with a discussion of the National Student Association.

Reed Martin, president, directed the discussion in pointing out the advantages that Rice could obtain as a member school.

These include such things as speakers, participation in conferences with students from around the world, and access to various services sponsored by the NSA.

Martin pointed out that Rice has never been a member of this organization, and that past Senates have tended to dismiss it as an ultra-liberal political society.

HOWEVER, TALK with the immediate past presidents of the organization have convinced Martin that the NSA concerns itself only with problems in which students have a direct concern.

Taking into consideration the fact that other student groups such as the TISA are of no benefit to our student body, the Senate unanimously voted to join the NSA.

A clarification of Campanile policy in regard to the selection of favorites and beauties was called for, but Editor Calvin was nowhere to be found.

It was pointed out that there has arisen a certain undercurrent of discontent as to procedure by which these selections are made—or rather the lack of uniform procedure.

THE MANNER OF selection is left entirely up to the Campanile staff, and it was felt that since the girls appear in the beauty and favorite section of the Campanile are passed off as selections of Rice University, there should be some standard procedure.

Presumably some clarification of this matter is forthcoming.

The meeting closed with a somewhat abstract discussion of election procedure. It was felt by many members of the Senate that since the emphasis of campus government has shifted to the colleges, college elections should (Continued on Page 6) be held before the all-school elections.

This would make it possible for many of the campus leaders who are defeated in college elections to file for an all-school position.

Any change in respect to this matter will have to wait until next year.
