High-level synthesis design methodology
High level synthesis (HLS) [1], also known as behavioral synthesis and algorithmic synthesis, is a design process in which a high level, functional description of a design is automatically compiled into a RTL implementation that meets certain user specified design constraints. The HLS design description is ‘high level’ compared to RTL in two aspects: design abstraction, and specification language.