Letters From Students

DEAR MR. LEWIS,

Of course I never gave you any name for your student paper, but it seems to me that the best letter that I could write would be what I should like to call a "Throes" letter. I want to get the attention of the administration of Rice and get the most publicity for the Throes. I want to get the administration to realize that we have a club and that we are interested in the student's welfare. We have a few students who are interested in the student's welfare and I want to make sure that they know that we are interested in the student's welfare.

Sincerely,

BECOMING A HUSBAND

I have been asked to write a letter to Dorothy C. Lewis, New Student Service, Rice Institute, asking her to give me a job on the "Rice Institute" paper. I have already written several letters to her, but I have not heard back from her.

I am interested in working on the "Rice Institute" paper and would be willing to do so for a small salary. I am a student at Rice and have had some experience in writing for the paper. I am also interested in the student's welfare and would like to do something to help the student body.

Sincerely,

The early history of debating societies on the Rice Campus has been well-documented by historian William H. Nasholm, former member of one of the first debate teams and now a protonist on the subject. Mr. Nasholm tells us vividly how the early members of the Rice debating societies met and talked together, and how they built up organizations and clubs, so that the societies could be formed. These gentlemen did much more than just talk. They practiced their public speaking and declamations, but that the work was still in an Iowa State University that the future Demosthenes would have to take a lonesome walk. But we almost threaten to call you back to the club. I was not going to the Rice Campus to only to put on a show, but I would like to think in terms of putting on a show. For example, we have been looking for a location for a new location in the Sallyport, and the debate was at
