GRADING is a necessary device for education, but grade means little unless it is a stimulus. Teachers have an obligation to make sure that students understand what the grade means and what they should do to improve it.

The system, system, in which every instructor must impose strict rules for examinations, and must the course; existing of the class, is a hard task. It would be both realistic and impractical. It would be a mistake to let the student forget that the grade he receives is based on the instructor's and the students' performance.

The other alternative is the real system, one that involves the student in the process. This is possible, of course, if we continue with the present system, in which many professors pay no attention at all to the student, while others are more concerned with the student's work.

For Rice's honor, let's work on a real system, a system of honor.
