Youth Congress

For young people's organizations in recent weeks have made headlines, the campus of the University of San Diego has been the scene of another significant event. The Youth Congress, an organization formed to advocate for the rights of American youth, has held its annual meeting on campus. The Congress has been criticized for its radical views and has faced opposition from university administrators. The meeting was held on campus, and the students involved in the Congress claim to have the support of the majority of the student body.

The demands of the Youth Congress include the following:

1. A call for an end to the Vietnam War
2. The abolition of the draft
3. The promotion of civil rights for all Americans
4. The establishment of a living minimum wage

The Congress claims to have the support of the majority of the student body, and it has been accused of being a radical organization.

The Youth Congress feels that its demands are in line with the opinions of the majority of the student body. However, the university administration has expressed concerns about the organization's activities.

The Student Council has been asked to respond to the Youth Congress's demands. It is expected that the council will make a decision on the matter soon.

Each operator in San Francisco's Chinatown telephone exchange must speak English plus at least three of the five Chinese languages - Cantonese, Mandarin, Hakka, Yue, and Wu - to handle calls. For the average Chinese, understanding all five is no easy feat.

Since there is no Chinese alphabet, the 36 page directory, being edited by phone operators, is presented in the same manner. It is handwritten — thus reproduced by requests and printing processes. Subscribers are listed by street, instead of alphabetically, and operators must know the hand-by-hand for the Chinese soldiers by number — but by names and address.

Here is a Bell System exchange that in many ways is unique. But in the case of the Chinatown exchange, the subscribers are more like those in San Francisco's Chinatown.
