

I feel anxious and impatient when I think of you and the baby. Though I feel that it is right and best that you should wait until it suits your husband to have you come — for you are not all my own little child now — and your happiness depends on you and your husband. Has your husband any objection?

If I could go on now and take your sister to see you I should say to you to stay until you can leave with your husband's entire willingness to have you come — and I should advise him to stay where he is if he thinks best to do so —

There is a risk in charge — we cannot foresee our guard against events.

I am working hard to earn money now that I am anxious to have it up but to spend for the comfort and convenience of my family — I want to make my home more habitable and hoped to be able to have it done before you come — Sometimes I think it would be so unfortunate here for you that I ought to say to you to wait until I can add to the house — but then I think that if you came that we two would feel so much lighter hearted — that we could do more, and that for a while you and Sister and the baby could all sleep in one bed (a most cheering anticipation) I could take Dill with me anywhere in the house, Sister will fix this up for you and I must have the red school bus so good bye my little child from your loving Mother
