This annual report encompasses the activities of the institute for fiscal year 2010 from July 1, 2009, to June 30, 2010.

08.29.09  Students discuss their summer 2010 internships as part of the Jesse Jones Leadership Center Summer in D.C. Policy Research Internship Program.

10.30.09  James A. Baker, III, right, stands in front of a segment of the Berlin Wall during a conference discussing German unification, an event he played a pivotal role in as U.S. secretary of state. From left are: Charles Powell, former private secretary to British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher; Roland Dumas, former minister of foreign affairs of France; Markus Meckel, former minister of foreign affairs for the German Democratic Republic; and Hans-Dietrich Genscher, former foreign minister of the Federal Republic of Germany.

05.22.10  NASA administrator Charles Bolden discusses President Barack Obama’s plans for the space program at the Baker Institute’s fourth annual International Space Medicine Summit. The summit brings together leading physicians and space biomedical scientists from space-faring nations for high-level discussions on research needed to prevent and/or mitigate the medical and biomedical challenges associated with long-duration space flight.
The James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy is a nonprofit, nonpartisan think tank at Rice University in Houston, Texas. The institute produces independent, innovative research on domestic and foreign policy issues with a focus on providing decision makers in the public and private sectors with relevant and timely policy assessments and recommendations. In order to inform the general public on key policy issues, the institute disseminates its research and policy recommendations widely through its state-of-the-art communications facilities.

By bringing statesmen, scholars and students together, the institute broadens the content and reach of its policy assessments and recommendations, and provides an open forum for debate and discussion.

The institute educates students on public policy issues and related subjects by teaching courses at Rice University and sponsoring student intern and mentoring programs at home and abroad.

In my inaugural speech marking the founding of the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy, I laid out my vision for a nonpartisan policy institute at Rice University. My goal was to establish an institute that would serve as a bridge between the world of ideas and the world of action; one that would connect statesmen, scholars and students.

At that time, I also spoke about the need for leadership in the policy arena. People generally recognize leadership when they see it, but too often we fail to understand how to develop, nurture and protect it.

At this point in our development, I am proud to say that the Baker Institute has become a recognized leader in policy and scholarly debate. In the current discourse of our day, on issues such as energy, tax policy, Middle East conflict resolution and health care, the institute has become known, both in the United States and abroad, for contributions that help guide current and future policymakers.

As we approach our 20th anniversary in 2013, our challenge is to determine the best way to continue developing programs that can maintain and expand our role as a leader among premier policy institutions.

This first annual report provides information on the state of the institute in fiscal year 2010 and underscores the essential role our supporters play in our achievements to date and will play in our future progress. We will continue to build on our accomplishments and broaden the scope of our research and teaching programs in the world of public policy.

The past 12 months have been among the Baker Institute’s most productive.

Our public policy programs provided cutting-edge research and analysis. Baker Institute Energy Forum research was featured prominently in the media; the institute’s Health Economics Program released a timely study analyzing children’s insurance coverage; the Science and Technology Policy Program published policy reports on stem cell policy and the need for global scientific collaboration; and our Conflict Resolution Program published a report on “Getting to the Territorial Endgame of an Israeli-Palestinian Peace Settlement.”

We commemorated the 20th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall and the unification of Germany with the American and European statesmen who shaped those momentous events. A former U.S. secretary of the treasury and the president of The World Bank shared their thoughts on the global financial crisis and domestic fiscal reform.

We have expanded our offerings to Rice University students, and now 10 Baker Institute fellows are teaching undergraduate and graduate classes. Our dynamic Baker Institute student internship and mentorship programs have also grown to include projects abroad. In our 17th year, we enter the age of social media by establishing a presence on Facebook and Twitter, as well as launching a blog and an e-mail newsletter highlighting the institute’s research, people and events.

In April, we celebrated the 80th birthday of our honorary chairman, James A. Baker, III. His vision for the institute shapes our mission of lending a meaningful voice to our nation’s deliberations on public policy issues. In the year ahead, we shall continue to produce the highest-quality policy research and events that inform, educate and influence the public, scholars, statesmen and students.

Our accomplishments would not be possible without the confidence and generosity of our donors and supporters to whom we are grateful.

The Baker Institute’s engagement with policymakers and students expanded this year as our scholars sought new ways to inform the debate on selected public policy issues. The formulation, implementation and evaluation of public policy, both domestic and international, were a top priority, with a particularly timely emphasis on energy, health care, science and technology, and conflict resolution issues.

04.21.10 C.V. Starr Transnational China Fellow Steven Lewis, right, discusses public policy in China with Benjamin Chou ’13, a political science and Asian studies major. Lewis works with Chou on Asian energy policy research. In return for helping Lewis with his research, Chou, who is a Rice University Century Scholar, receives extra research funds to travel, do foreign study or present his work at conferences.

As Congress debated health care reform, the institute’s Health Economics Program issued a policy report in cooperation with the Children’s Defense Fund showing the health and cost benefits of insuring children. The program also examined whether hospitals in Texas shift the cost of the uninsured to private payers, with preliminary data showing no evidence of such cost shifting. A third study showed that states that dropped regulations governing the performance of two common heart procedures demonstrated no increase in death rates. The program additionally embarked on a National Cancer Institute-funded study of costs associated with cancer treatment.

The institute’s Science and Technology Program examined issues ranging from the nation’s scientific illiteracy to the scientific community’s attitude toward religion. Scientists from the United Kingdom and the United States discussed stem cell policies in their respective countries. A conference on comparative effectiveness research examined which health care procedures work best for various patient populations and which present the greatest benefits or risks. The program also produced a policy report in support of more flexible immigration policies for science researchers working at universities and in government, as well as worldwide standards for peer review, research ethics and accreditation.

This year’s Civic Scientist lecture featured Bruce Alberts, editor-in-chief of Science magazine, discussing “Redefining Science Education and the Role that Scientists Play in Society.” The Civic Scientist Program seeks to expose scientists and future scientists to the notion that their roles expand outside of the laboratory.
INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY, SPACE AND THE ENVIRONMENT

The Information Technology Policy Program brought together information executives to discuss pressing cybersecurity issues, including threats to national security by hackers acting independently or in concert with a foreign government. This focus was reiterated by program events with influential policymakers, including retired Air Force Maj. Gen. Dale Meyerrose, former chief information officer for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, and U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Texas, ranking member of the U.S. House Subcommittee on Emerging Threats, Cybersecurity, Science and Technology.

NASA administrator Charles Bolden gave the keynote address at the Space Policy Program’s fourth International Space Medicine Summit. The 2010 conference brought together scientists from space-faring nations including the United States, Russia and China, with the goal of finding the best ways to use the International Space Station for research, as well as to ensure the well-being of astronauts and cosmonauts on future expeditions.

Climate change was another focus for institute researchers, who collaborated on the best ways to understand, discuss and engage policymakers in this scientifically complex topic.

CONFLICT RESOLUTION

The Conflict Resolution Program at the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy, chaired by Edward P. Djerejian, is actively involved in the formulation of policy analysis, proposals and consultations with decision makers. The program seeks to advance conflict resolution efforts with a special focus on the broader Middle East.

In February, the Conflict Resolution Program published “Getting to the Territorial Endgame of an Israeli-Palestinian Peace Settlement,” which offered U.S. negotiators concrete recommendations on the territorial component of a peace settlement based on the line of June 4, 1967, with agreed-upon swaps and modifications, could be introduced at the right time and, depending on actual political circumstances, serve as a guide to enable gradual progress, step by step. The contours of this territorial bridging proposal are outlined, as well as the need to prepare the necessary planning tools to achieve a successful outcome.

The program also sponsored lectures examining the rationale and content of strategies for dealing with the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, as well as the broader prospects for peace between Arabs and Israelis and the development of democratic and security institutions within the Palestinian body politic.

The report finds that a United States bridging proposal on the territorial component of peace based on the line of June 4, 1967, with agreed-upon swaps and modifications, could be introduced at the right time and, depending on actual political circumstances, serve as a guide to enable gradual progress, step by step. The contours of this territorial bridging proposal are outlined, as well as the need to prepare the necessary planning tools to achieve a successful outcome.

The program also sponsored lectures examining the rationale and content of strategies for dealing with the Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, as well as the broader prospects for peace between Arabs and Israelis and the development of democratic and security institutions within the Palestinian body politic.
EUROPE, LATIN AMERICA AND ASIA

The peaceful reunification of Germany following the fall of the Berlin Wall 20 years ago was examined at a unique conference panel discussion featuring the key foreign ministers and political personalities involved in the historic “Two-plus-Four” negotiations, including James A. Baker, III (United States), Roland Dumas (France), Hans-Dietrich Genscher (Federal Republic of Germany), Markus Meckel (German Democratic Republic), Charles Powell (United Kingdom) and Eduard Shevardnadze (Soviet Union).

Peacemaking and the preservation of peace were also the focus for the Latin American Initiative. The Americas Project conference brought together rising leaders from across the Western Hemisphere to discuss promoting peace and stability in the 21st century. In other lectures, speakers examined press freedoms in Latin America, as well as drug policy on both sides of the border, and the implications for democracy. Through its signature programs — the Americas Project, the U.S.-Mexico Border Program and the Vecinos Lecture Series — the Latin American Initiative provided a forum for leading stakeholders from government, the private sector, academia and civil society to exchange their views on pressing issues confronting the region.

The Transnational China Project surveyed subway commuters in four Chinese cities on the increasing use of advertising in public spaces and presented the findings at a conference co-hosted with the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences. At another conference co-hosted with the Shanghai Institutes of International Studies, the program recommended that the U.S. and Chinese governments should consider creating shared public service advertisements to increase awareness of issues such as global warming and energy conservation.

South Asia also was a focus of institute programs, with lectures examining security and development challenges facing India and Pakistan, as well as the global ramifications. Scholars discussed opportunities for collaboration, and examined urban challenges facing one of the fastest-growing regions in the world, with a focus on Karachi, Pakistan. Guests included Meera Shankar, India’s ambassador to the United States, and Makhdoom Shah Mehmood Qureshi, the foreign minister of Pakistan.
DOMESTIC STUDIES

With reports of terror attacks in the news, policymakers looked to the Baker Institute for current, in-depth information to better understand the best ways to enhance regional and national security. The Homeland Security and Terrorism Program sought to do this in 2009-2010 with a focus on assessing the risks within and outside our borders. The program strives to improve the security of the region and the nation by educating citizens and civil authorities and through the identification of policy measures that make existing security practices more effective. The Texas Security Forum hosted an event at the Baker Institute that drew attention to terrorist planning and activities within our own country.

The institute’s Drug Policy Program examined the “War on Drugs,” bringing together government officials and advocates of drug decriminalization and/or needle exchange programs for a frank discussion on the successes and failures of U.S. drug policy. The prospects for marijuana legalization in Texas were also examined. The institute acquired the Drug Truth Archive, a collection of more than 600 online interviews on drug policy conducted by national radio host Dean Becker. This resource will allow policymakers, scholars and interested citizens to learn from the experience and insight of a wide range of informed people who have spent years grappling with these issues.

The institute’s history program focused on American conservation and the Cold War, as well as recognition of the role the United States has played in promoting global security.
ENERGY POLICY

Policymakers seeking original, forward-looking discussion about carbon management and energy policy from a national and global perspective turned to the Baker Institute Energy Forum for innovative, thorough and timely scholarship. Program scholars traveled to Brazil, Japan and other locations around the globe to present their research. A high-level roundtable in Abu Dhabi brought together executives and policymakers to discuss the energy market consequences of U.S. energy and climate policy.

A policy report on U.S. biofuels questioned the viability of a domestic-only strategy, suggesting tariff policies on imported ethanol that block cheaper imports are misguided. Research on oil futures and speculators highlighted the need for better understanding of the financial players in oil future markets, and the implications for U.S. energy security. An analysis of the past, present and future of resource nationalism in Latin America showed a role for independent oil companies and local governments, particularly in Colombia and Brazil. The program examined the expanding role of shale gas in the United States in a Wall Street Journal commentary, as well as the domestic and global ramifications for oil producers. Another forum publication provided an overview of the Obama administration’s first year of energy initiatives, concluding that any viable policy must include both short- and long-term solutions.

The Energy Forum also sent students to Lesotho, Africa, to work with local communities on ways to improve energy efficiency and health. The group conducted field surveys and focus groups to identify trends in income, family structure, energy use, social capital and health.

And, as Congress debated the merits of legislation designed to curb carbon emissions, a series of Energy Forum workshops provided industry and academic feedback in anticipation of a major fall 2010 conference on the consequences of such policies on domestic and global energy markets.
The Baker Institute Tax and Expenditure Policy Program is actively involved in research that focuses on the effects of fundamental reform of our nation’s tax system. This year, that research included work on computer models capable of examining the economic impact of a value-added tax and of corporate tax reform measures. The program also focused on the city of Houston’s underfunded pension plans, as well as the effects of the financial crisis on household wealth.

On a global level, the institute’s International Economics Program, in conjunction with the Kelly Day Endowment on the Status of Women and Human Rights in the Middle East, spent the year working on a project in Egypt that tests microfinance — or small-loan — lending systems designed to help poor, rural communities in developing countries. The research focuses on two lending models: bank loans based on trust and accountability instead of collateral (such as those pioneered by the Grameen Bank in Bangladesh); and credit union-style loans based on Rotating Savings and Credit Associations, which rotate interest-free credit among its members and are therefore acceptable in all religions that forbid usury, including Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

The Mosbacher Global Issues Series welcomed The Honorable Robert B. Zoellick, president of The World Bank Group. A former U.S. trade representative in President George W. Bush’s administration, Zoellick spoke on the effects of the global economic downturn. The institute also hosted Henry M. Paulson, the 74th U.S. secretary of the treasury, who discussed his role in helping the nation weather the beginning of the current financial crisis. Paulson’s visit was part of the Shell Distinguished Lecture Series.

State policymakers benefited from the institute’s law and urban economics scholarship, which focused on the application of political economy and political theory to the study of public law. The expertise also provided insight into state constitutional law.
The Baker Institute’s 36 fellows and scholars produce the cutting-edge research that gives the institute its national and international reputation.

Their work covers a wide variety of domestic issues, including energy policy, the economics of health reform and stem cell research, as well as the challenges confronting major regions of the world: the Middle East, Asia, Latin America, Africa and Europe.

Much of the institute’s success comes from its status as a strictly nonpartisan organization. This model leads to independent thought — and pragmatic and innovative policy proposals that are often reported in national publications. The fellows also write policy reports, books and articles and hold workshops and lectures throughout the year. They regularly brief policymakers and are an active and accessible resource for the media. In 2009, two Baker Institute fellows were the most quoted academics at Rice University.

“What makes the Baker Institute unique is our ability to focus our research on issues of pressing public concern,” says Allen Matusow, academic affairs director at the Baker Institute and the William Gaines Twyman Professor of History at Rice University. “We have reached out to the faculty and students at Rice in a meaningful way to integrate the institute’s work across campus.”

The development of the Internet has irrevocably changed how we find, absorb and think about information, creating new challenges for public policy, contends Christopher Bronk, the Baker Institute fellow in information technology policy. He studies the innovative and complex ways that information technology is transforming government and global geopolitics.

This year, Bronk brought U.S. Rep. Michael McCaul, R-Texas, ranking member of the U.S. House Subcommittee on Emerging Threats, Cybersecurity, Science and Technology, to speak on our society’s rapidly growing vulnerability in cyberspace.

“Our program aims to serve as a conduit between the world of public policy and information and computing technology,” he says. Indeed, Bronk has put considerable effort into building a vibrant, relevant program on security in cyberspace, spearheading regular meetings of chief information security officers from some of Houston’s highest-profile corporations — including Continental Airlines, Halliburton, Waste Management, Schlumberger and Shell — to promote collaboration on big picture issues. At the request of the Greater Houston Partnership, Bronk serves on the Technology Infrastructure Committee, providing guidance on developing the next generation of networks and information services for the Houston area 10-county region. Rice also has become the teaching center for the Information Systems Security Association’s certification courses.

“The point of information policy is not locking it away someplace and throwing away the key,” contends Bronk. That approach is reflected in his research, which includes a paper on Wikipedia technology’s implications for knowledge-sharing in the diplomatic corps co-authored with a former colleague at the U.S. State Department.

A practitioner–academic, Bronk holds a doctorate from the Maxwell School of Syracuse University and studied at Oxford. Before joining the institute in 2006, he was a Foreign Service Officer, serving in the Office of eDiplomacy in Washington, D.C., and also on the U.S.-Mexico border.
One of the Baker Institute’s central missions is to engage students — the next generation of policymakers — through programs and courses that offer real-world experience and the opportunity to learn from top policy experts.

Many institute fellows and scholars teach courses at Rice University that complement their areas of study. “I have been impressed by the students’ interest in global affairs, and their questions suggest a real desire to understand the world around them,” said institute founding director Ambassador Edward P. Djerejian, who taught an undergraduate course on contemporary Middle East politics during the spring semester.

Competitive internships include summers at government and nonprofit agencies in the nation’s capital through the Jesse Jones Leadership Center Summer in D.C. Policy Research Internship Program; in Europe at the French Institute of International Relations; and through an Energy Forum program that promotes sustainability in developing countries such as Lesotho and Morocco.

Students at Rice also have multiple opportunities to engage firsthand with institute scholars and staff. Undergraduates are invited to apply for research and administrative positions at the institute. Through the Baker Institute Student Forum, Rice undergraduates plan institute-supported public policy events to engage students across campus. Student Forum highlights this year included meetings with public officials, debates on health care and on the death penalty, and private meetings and discussions with The World Bank president Robert Zoellick and former U.S. treasury secretary Henry Paulson.

Like many of her peers at Rice University, Amanda Hu ’10 wants to make the world a better place.

An idea took shape during the two summers she interned for the Baker Institute Energy Forum in the African nation of Lesotho: Hu envisioned interviewing hundreds of at-risk youths in a developing country about their life and career ambitions. With this information, she reasoned, policymakers could tailor programs to help the younger generation achieve their goals.

Back in Houston, Hu turned her idea into a plan for a survey of Botswana — and last May won a Fulbright scholarship to fund it. “My proposal directly sprang from thinking about what would become of the young people in Lesotho,” she recalls. “If I had never been able to see it with my own eyes, I’d probably have a different concept of my future.”

In August, Hu traveled to Botswana to begin interviewing orphans and other vulnerable youths. “I want their voices to be heard, to empower them to get to where they wanted to go.”

Hu says her experience as a Baker Institute intern in Lesotho “solidified my desire to help, and changed my life.”

Students with an interest in public policy should “definitely check out internship opportunities,” adds Hu, who plans to attend medical school after returning home to Seattle, Wash., next year. “You never know where they may lead.”
The James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy’s fiscal year runs from July 1 through June 30. The institute’s main expenditures include fellows’ salaries and research-related programs and events. Such research-related events include, but are not limited to, speaking series, forums and symposiums. Significant expenditures also include operating expenses such as administration salaries and support, facilities maintenance, communications, publications and archiving.

The institute expended in 2010 approximately $670,000 on its first major capital improvement project since the completion of Baker Hall in 1997, upgrading audio visual equipment with state-of-the-art technology. This investment will significantly enhance the institute’s outreach and help cut costs through teleconferencing.

Endowment distributions suffered in 2010 relative to previous years due to market underperformance and the economic recession. The Baker Institute embarked on a successful campaign strategy that increased annual and one-time donor gifts to help compensate for the loss in endowment distribution. Total 2010 contributions to the Baker Institute increased 30% versus 2009 contributions, and increased 67% versus 2008 contributions. Despite this success, the institute has several research program initiatives that remain in need of funding.

The reduced market value of the Baker Institute’s endowment at the beginning of Fiscal Year 2010 was approximately $61 million.

The James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy depends on the generous philanthropy of individuals, foundations and corporations around the globe that supports the research of our fellows and scholars, and introduces students to the world of public policy.

We are grateful to those who sustain the institute’s groundbreaking work and allow our forums and programs to reach out to the public at lectures, conferences and other events.

The institute invited Roundtable and Associate Roundtable members to more than 100 special events at Baker Hall last year. Our distinguished speakers included current and former heads of state, leading researchers, authors and scholars. During question-and-answer sessions and receptions, Baker Institute members engaged with the experts and experienced firsthand the benefits of their investment in public policy.

One highlight of the 2010 fiscal year was the 80th birthday celebration of James A. Baker, III, the institute’s namesake and honorary chair. The gala raised $2.1 million in Mr. Baker’s honor. In addition, legendary Houston lawyer Joe Jamail made a special $1 million donation. His exceptional generosity and commitment to excellence will be recognized by naming the west wing of James A. Baker III Hall after Lee and Joseph D. Jamail.

The Baker Institute’s success this past year would not have been possible without your generous gifts. Cumulatively, our supporters contributed more than $6.2 million during fiscal year 2010. Every donation helps to advance the mission of the Baker Institute to bridge the gap between the world of ideas and the world of action.

The Baker Institute would like to express gratitude for the support of our many donors over the past fiscal year. Although we are only able to list those gifts that totaled $500 or more from July 1, 2009, through June 30, 2010, please accept our thanks for each gift, which helps to support the Baker Institute’s programs and research. We strive for accuracy in acknowledging those who have given to the Baker Institute, and we regret any omission or error, which we ask you to bring to our attention.

The 80th birthday celebration of James A. Baker, III, was held on April 24, 2010, and attended by 700 friends, family and supporters of the honorary chair of the institute. The event raised more than $2.1 million in support of the research conducted by the institute’s fellows and scholars.
