PROGRAM NOTES

Suite Paysanne Hongroise (Hungarian Peasant Suite) . Béla Bartók

Béla Bartók’s mature compositional style was profoundly affected by his diligent research on native Hungarian folk music. Beginning in 1906, he made annual pilgrimages into rural areas, recording folk songs on an Edison phonograph. One of the early results of this project was a series of suites for the piano. Hungarian-born ethnomusicologist, pianist, and composer Paul Arma, a student of Bartók, transcribed one of those suites for flute and piano, omitting only one movement, the Ballade. Hungarian-born flutist András Adorjan believes that Arma chose this particular suite because the music which Bartók originally recorded was performed on the flute rather than sung.

Sonatina for Flute, Clarinet, and Piano . . . . Paul Schoenfield

This work was commissioned by the Minnesota Commissioning Club in honor of Sam and Thelma Hunter’s fiftieth wedding anniversary and published in 1994. The composer writes: “Almost every aspect of this Sonatina was conceived with the Hunter family in mind. Thelma, her son John, and daughter-in-law Karen are professional musicians, and this suggested the scoring for piano, clarinet, and flute. Likewise, the genre of each of the three movements has a connection with the Hunters.

The opening movement is a Charleston (to the best of my knowledge, the Charleston was invented the same year as Thelma was born), and the last movement is a jig (Sam was born in Ireland.) While I was living in Minnesota, I had the reputation of being a ragtime player... and this is no doubt what prompted Thelma to request that I include a rag... It was with great affection and warmth that I composed this work... It is a tribute to an extraordinary couple that has extended to me, and the Minnesota community in general, an abundance of kindness, consideration, and good will.”

Sonata for Clarinet and Piano . . . . Leonard Bernstein

Bernstein composed this sonata during 1941-42, at the age of twenty-four. It was written for and dedicated to his friend, clarinetist David Oppenheim. This work was to become his first published and first recorded composition, and foreshadows Bernstein’s universally known West Side Story in its rhythmic vitality and jazz orientation.

Slavonic Dance Suite No.1 . . . Antonín Dvořák/Michael Webster

More than any other work, the Slavonic Dances, Op. 46 spread Antonín Dvořák’s fame beyond the confines of his native Czech fatherland. Between 1874 and 1877, Dvořák received several prizes from the annual Austrian State Stipendium, a competition for which Johannes Brahms was a judge.
Late in 1877, Brahms sent Dvořák’s Moravian Duets to his publisher, Simrock, who immediately commissioned the Slavonic Dances for piano four-hands hoping they would achieve the same kind of success as Brahms’ Hungarian Dances. Simrock was not disappointed. Not only did the eight Slavonic Dances achieve instant widespread recognition in both their original and orchestrated versions, but Dvořák was inspired to write and submit to Simrock many new and wonderful works which established his international reputation. Almost immediately, Simrock urged Dvořák to write a second set of dances, but he did not respond until 1886 with eight more Slavonic Dances, Op. 72. Slavonic Dance Suite No. 1 is taken primarily from the four-hand version, using dances from both Op. 46 and Op. 72.

This arrangement may be heard on “World Wide Webster,” the Webster Trio’s latest release (Crystal Records CD 357), along with arrangements of Brahms’ Hungarian Dances, Debussy’s Petite Suite, and four works by Louis Moreau Gottschalk.
